1. Describe how health equity and social justice are interdisciplinary concepts incorporating ethics, history, sociology, and health sciences.
2. Explain the recent trend in health ethics moving beyond clinical issues to the broader issues of social justice and health equity.
3. Identify and describe the distribution of health inequities and their social justice contributing factors across vulnerable population groups (age, gender, gender and sexual orientations, location, & ability), disease outcomes and access to quality health care.
4. Research and analyze the historical conceptualization of race and ethnicity as they relate to health disparities in the United States.
5. Trace and analyze the development ethical principles relevant to the culture of individuals and their communities, including the principle of autonomy, beneficence, and justice as it applies to health promotion and research.
6. Analyze how traditional ethical theories apply to various cultures (African American, Native American, Latinx, & Asian/Pacific Islanders) and extrapolate universal values that transcend culture.
7. Evaluate concepts and arguments across disciplines (ethics, history, sociology and health science) related to health inequalities and social injustice.
8. Create an organized written analytical response to describe the development of health disparities within a vulnerable population group (race, ethnicity, ability status, gender, age, or sexual identity) due to historical treatment, cultural practices, and/or acculturation and critique strategies used to address health inequalities within that population.
9. Use ethical theory to analyze case studies of health disparities and social justice issues and relate to personal narrative.
